The state elected Thursday not to prosecute six Yale students charged with trespassing when they interrupted a Central Intelligence Agency recruiting interview.

Assistant State's Attorney Burton A. Kaplan said Yale's executive committee had already placed the students on probation and each of them agreed to donate $20 to charity.

They were arrested March 4 at Yale's Career Services office when they insisted the interviewer leave the campus because the "CIA is a criminal organization that consistently perpetrated acts of murder, terrorism, assassination and genocide in the service of U.S. imperialism."

Susan Hauser, the dean of career services, filed a complaint with the executive committee, alleging the six violated a regulation covering the orderly conduct of university functions. The committee put each on probation.
